When Elvis Presley hit the road in June 1977, he was an absolute mess. He was only 42, but years of prescription drug abuse and horrifying dietary habits had left him bloated, depressed and near death. He had an enlarged heart, an enlarged intestine, hypertension and incredibly painful bowel problems. He was barely sleeping and should probably have been in the hospital, but he was still a huge draw on the concert circuit and the money was too good to turn down. It had been over a year since Elvis last released a studio album, and his manager, Colonel Tom Parker, was determined to get more product into the stores. Despite Elvis' horrid shape, Parker arranged for a camera crew to film the June 19th show in Omaha for a planned TV special and live album. It eventually did air on CBS two months after Elvis died, but has yet to resurface in any official capacity. Of course, this isn't the image of Elvis that his estate wants the fans to remember. Two days later (21 June), the cameras were still rolling when the tour hit Rapid City, South Dakota.

It was another weak and sad night until Elvis sat down at the piano near the end of the show to deliver what was a spellbinding rendition of "Unchained Melody." As guitarist Charlie Hodge held a microphone, Elvis dug deep and poured his heart into the song. His body was falling apart, but his voice remained almost as powerful as ever. Without any doubt, it's the last great moment of his career. The tour limped along through five more shows, wrapping up June 26th at the Market Square Arena in Indianapolis, Indiana. He died less than two months later. Attached is that great performance.

Traffic Monitoring and Data Collection

Data gathering is underway for TAM's Traffic Monitoring Report that is released every two years as part of the Congestion Management Program. Over the past month, vehicular counts have been taking place at 35 locations. Bicycle and pedestrian counts are underway at 28 locations. The data will be reviewed and compiled for inclusion in the Traffic Monitoring Report, expected to be released in early 2021. Due to a high level of interest in the travel data and potential impacts during COVID-19, TAM
